Family, friends, and community make our lives human. A feature of life among others is opposition about what is right and good. Very often the opposition is irresolvable. People talk past each other and become angry. Life becomes bitter. This problem is not new. Socrates proposed a solution: question and answer instead of opposed speeches. Professor Rudebusch will lead a discussion that considers ways in which Socrates' solution fails, ways in which it is limited, and ways in which it solves the perennial problem of civic life.
